"The Science of Divine Being"

What is the connection Terra Firma, or solid ground and the meaning of "sustainability", a common word used very generally today? And why a reference to Latin definitions? Latin helps to define the very root, the meaning of our vocabulary which has gone awry.

Sustainability - sustain, vb., to provide nourishment, to keep going, to hold up under, to endure, to support as true, legal or valid.
Sustenance - a supplying with the necessities of life.

As to the meaning of words, so often heard, or seen in written form, we seem to have put aside what "true sustainability" means pertaining to ourselves.

True sustainability within ourselves is a non-structural source - be that Spirit, Allness, Divine Being, God. It's unfaltering principle is LOVE, the absolute essence of life. With an understanding and acknowledgment of this guiding sustainability of beingness, there exists a world where qualities abide, and are continuously being expressed.

Within each of us is the wholeness, the completeness of a love so encompassing that harmony, peace, joy, contentment, beauty, and love are felt. These qualities, are the true sustainable feelings of our divine selfhood. This is the Science of Ontology, where one can know and understand one's divine being.

To "sustain" oneself by living these qualities, and understanding that they are innate is the first step to take in gaining a life lived as divine being. The science of consciousness is a law. The law of being these qualities. Our beingness is truth living these qualities.

Since these qualities are the sustaining substance of thought, all within our own consciousness, never outside - out there, always within our true self, in conforming our thought to these divine ideas, and feeling their truth, our experience becomes as we think.

It is so simple, the thoughts of joy, felt and lived, produce joy. The thoughts of love, felt and lived, enhances love. The thoughts of peace, felt and lived, equates to more peace. The thoughts of beauty, felt and lived, creates more beauty. The thoughts of abundance, felt and lived, is abundance. All of these qualities are within your “sustaining” consciousness of divine being.

When harmony is felt, that sense of wholeness equates to health. When abundance is felt, that sense of abundance equates to wealth. When joy, love, peace, are felt, that sense of joy, love and peace is experienced. This is the divine intelligence which “sustains” us, urging us to explore the inner truth.

Be ever so discerning what one chooses to think and acknowledge as our true self. Conform to the divine where truth reigns. Experience the Science of Ontology, and live your life abundantly! This is “True Sustenance, True Sustainability”.
